Washington Cor. N. Y. Tribune, Feb. 12. The American Claims for Indirect Damages-The Probable Result.

A great many friends of the Administration believed a week ago that the new dispute with Great Britain over the Alabama claims would revive the declining popularity of President Grant. The discussion, started in London for political purposes, might be used for political effect on this side of the ocean also, and when the President declared that he would consent to no modification of the American case it was supposed that the people would rally enthusiastically to his support, and in a new patriotic excitement a multitude of old differences would be forgotten. This hope has not been justified by the event. The than reinforced by the Alabama difficulty, and whatever may be thought of the merits of our claim, there can hurdly be two Mr. J. W. Akers, of this city, who recently intelligent opinions about the matter in which it has been presented. The question of indirect damage has been the essence of our dispute with England for years, and it was the very first point propounded in the conferences of the Joint High Commission in Washington which led to the adoption the capture of any one member of the of the Treaty. How are we to account for the extraordinary fact that this vital disagreement is still left open, so that the Treaty, which was supposed to have settled everything, has really settled nothing at all? In the absence of some definite statement from our Government, I think we are bound to assume that the English Minister is sincere in declaring that it does not understand claims for consequential damages to be embraced in the questions referred by the treaty to the tribunal of arbitration. I am assured, indeed, by a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the British Commissioners certainly went home with the belief that those claims had been excluded. They were claims which Great Britain had always refused to submit to arbitration, just as we refused on our side to submit claims for the Confederate cotton loan or the Fenian raids. And if they were to be considered, they ought certainly to have been distinctly recognized either in the protocols or the text of the treaty. "But the most you can say," added the Senator whom I have already quoted, "is that the treaty does not expressly rule them out." The importance of a distinct understanding on this point is all the greater in view of the well-known rule of law that damages can be awarded only for the natural and proximate consequences of an act-a rule which Mr. Sumner had in mind when he made

"In case of arbitration," says one of the Justices of the United States apreme Court, "it is a general rule that the arbitrators must decide all questions that arise respecting their own jurisdiction. The obvious course in this dispute is for the Geneva tribural to determine whether the Treaty justifies the presentation of claims for indirect damages, and then to proceed with the arbitration. But it is not so evident, nor are we prepared to admit that it is a question for the arbitrators at all, whether Great Britain is responsible for damages for the general war expenses incurred by the United States after the battle of Gettysburg. It is certain that, had the intention to press such a FANCY GOODS, &c. SPECTACLES demand been understood on both sides at Washington, it would have brought the conferences to an abrupt conclusion. Not only would it have been impossible for Great Britain to place on record the expression of regret to which the United States naturally attached so much weight, and to acquiesce in the retrospective application of the new rules: not only must our Commis-

As it is, the agree ment for arbitration is entirely one-sided .-No matter how unreasonable the Arbitrators may consider it to judge our conduct their award must be governed by those rules, and they are not allowed to consult their own sense of justice. How then can it be argued that in estimating the damages, it any, to be paid, they should be relieved of all obligation to follow legal principles common to both the litigant nations, and with a discretionary power to impose on Great Britain a penalty as great as victorious Germany exacted from prostrate
